A Fortune from A Recipe Book

What Three Girls Did with Grandmother's Manuscript

"I don't care! It's perfectly borrid to be poor," said Nina. "It's a diagraceor if it bu't, it's looked on as one. It's a perpetual mortification. It's a perpetual

"It's a shame," said Molly. "But I don't know how we can help it. Poor we "We must remain!" said Beila. "No, indeed! If there's any ingenuity in the feminine brain I'm going to work out of it."

Work, Bella!" exclaimed Molly, with onsternation in her dark eyes—pretty lan-pishing dark eyes to which consternation was unbecoming.

"Certainly, Why not? Our money is nearly all gone now, and it's either work! "Oh, Bello, how can you talk so!" ex-

"How can I talk so! I den't know what you mean. Do you suppose because food and dresses and flowers and servants and opera lones and horses have always been furnished to you that they are always going to be? Now when there is no one to Turnish them?"

"Oh, poor papa, poor papa," wept Molly,
"It would have been harder for him hand for any of us, if he had fixed. God was good in taking him, I think." Oh, Belia! Any one would suppose you didn't care anything about him at all. Good in taking him!"

But Bella made no reply. She sat with her fair cheek resting on her hand and a dewy food of recollection in her great the eyes. She have who it was that had been her father's conflicint and consoler and nerse and friend, while the other girls were danoing and flirting and making merry, and she knew now that the heedless lowery-loving girls, ignorant of the world, of business, of the first principles of life, had only berself to look to assesso as their had only herself to look to as soon as their Hitic hourd was gone.
"What kind of work, Bella?" sobbed

Modly.
"I don't know yet exactly."
"And what will Roland Tascotsay?" "I can't belp what he says. I don't imagine he will say anything. I don't imagine we shall ever see himagain."
"Bella! I don't believe you have a heart in your body! When he wasso in love with

"Perhaps he was not. He was in love with papa's forme and my position; and then I did very well to carry off the Tascot should think so!" cried Nina, 1 dignation taking another turn. "As if there was a Tascot of them all that had your bloom, your Titian hair, your eyes, your perfect treth, your simpe, your car-riage your accomplishments?"

"Yes, Bella, there are our accomplishments."

"Good for nothing," said Bella. "Not one
"Good for nothing," said Bella. "Not one of them would buy our cold cream. Pro-fessionals by the multitude do everything we can do, and do it all a great deal better,"
"Oh, Bella!" the others cried in chorus,
the tears pouring over their pretty faces,
"what are you going to do?"
"I fancy," said Rella, laughing and em-going to do nothing but help me out by keeping the house for me. But I am going to work. What I said just now about the cold crossin gave me an idea."

"What—whotsort of an idea." stammered

Well, you shall see," It was a week afterward that Bella came It was a week after ward that relia came to the two girls with something in her hand, a little white satin box, and as she opened it, and then the inner wrapping of silver those paper, she disclosed a cake of pearly winte soap exactly futing the box. "That is what I am going to do," she said. "I—I don't understand," said Molly.

"I am going to make scap."
The girls were too aghast to speak.
"I have a lot of grandmamma's old recipes. I shall make scap, of the finest, toilet waters, colognes, rose pearls, aro-matic vinegar. I shall put them up in the daintiest style. The creditors are going to let us stay on in the house one year. By that time I shall be able to rent it. We shall use these pariors for salesrooms; and I am going out now to speak to Mrs. Des-senerly, who I know will talk us up through the whole city and onlying territory. Our things will become the fashion."

"Out oh! oil" cred the two girls, fallthings will become the fasmon.
"Out end out" crief the two girls, fall-ing on each offer's necks and weeping to break their hearts. "Soap boilers!"
"This sorry you're assumed of me," said Bella demursly. "But if you don't like it. you beedn't appear, although I think it you be sin't appear, although I think it would bring us a great trade of curvosity, for a time at any rule, if you did. I am so many years older than you, it doesn't matter for me. I shall be twenty in a day or two. By the time you are twenty we shall have made a little fortune, and then we can go away and spend it where no one have as in the south of between in the knows us, in the south of Europe, in the north of Africa, in the west of America."

"A fortune made in soap—and not by our grandfather, but by ourselves! Oh. Bella.
Bella French. I should think papa and mamma would turn over in their graves to think of you! And what in the world will "We won't talk of those things," raid Bella, with dignity. "The moment you have any better idea we will act upon it, Hat now my cologue water in figuring and she had already cleared enough to send the girls abroad, and to hire maids in their places, to give her courage to enter on broader phases of her enterprise, and to broader pinases of her emergine, and to feel that half a dozen more years of such success would restore to her her father's hoose, and give her surfacent money to Dessenerly's determination, Bella could ill have maintained her place in society, had she chosen; but although she was nev ite left out, she made her life a quiet if bosy one.

And before long there came a day when, through the dishonesty of debtors, the rain of a railroad, and unfortunate speculations, of his own, Roland Tascot found himself penniles; and Belia had the satisfaction, if that it could be called, to her who cared nothing for him other than he was one of the kind of existe him a structure to her kind, of giving him a situation as her bookkeeper, where every day, as he saw her pretty fortune rolling up, he had the opportunity of gnashing his teeth and won-dering at his folly.

MARGARET FORD.

Painful.

"I saw a painful sight to-day, "said Mr.
Junius, as his wife handed him the toast.
"Well, there!" cried Mrs. Junius, uplifting her flands. "Now don't for pity's sake go ner fands. "Now don't for pity's sake go telling me any of those horrid stories about poorpeople falling off buildings and breaking their legs or at least their ribs and then having pieces put in the paper. I mean, of course, pieces of their legs, for that wouldn't be good sense but I do think that there are so many such things in every paper you pick up and it just fairly makes my blood run cold or at least that's what people call it, but I don't suppose it's any coider than it usually is and now for the land's sake, Junius, don't sit there solong saying nothing forden't you see how nervous I am buttell me what was the sight yousaw that was so awfully painful." And while his wife was topping for an in-stant at the blind crossing Mr. Junius sofuly
